Abstract title: China's endeavors to achieve carbon neutrality

Global warming is a common challenge for all mankind, with a continuous increase in carbon dioxide emissions being the main cause of that change. China is currently the world's largest carbon dioxide emitter and needs to make more efforts to reduce its carbon emissions. China has set clear targets for carbon peaks and carbon neutrality, and is currently taking steps and measures to achieve them. In the future, we will step up great efforts in energy conservation, green energy development, forest carbon sink construction, phased out fossil energy, and added green and low-carbon technological innovation, and strengthen cooperation with the international community on climate change.
